The modern human rights framework as we know it was born in the crucible of decolonisation. It is a historical context we would do well to remember. Secondly, human rights themselves have always been subject to efforts at colonisation: misappropriation and being manipulated for political ends. We need to recognise this for what it is, and in this sense the fight to decolonise human rights is a permanent one.

Steven L.B. Jensen's book, The Making of International Human Rights: The 1960s, Decolonization, and the Reconstruction of Global Values, argues that historians of human rights have ignored the role of countries in the Global South in driving the development of human rights, especially in the 1960s. His book has sparked important discussions amongst those interested in human rights, law, and postcolonial studies - for example, through this widely circulated article.

~~Decolonisation and Human Rights: A Forgotten Story ...~~

Decolonisation requires us to be intentional about engaging with Britain's history of very active participation in slavery and colonization, as well as the complicity of academics and universities in enabling, benefitting from and not properly acknowledging that history and its remnants.
