Main contractor: If you get a general builder to build your home they will, by default, be project managing the process - a great option if they've come recommended or you've seen evidence of their good work. However, you will pay a premium for this route rather than employing trades yourself, and you'll have less direct control of the project.

~~Who Can Manage My Project? - Build It~~

For a larger home renovation, you'll want the oversight of a GC if one is still within the budget. A general contractor will be the one who finds the rest of the subcontractors (plumbers, electricians, A/C companies, painters, etc.), schedules them in order based on progress, and is also held responsible for keeping people on track for deadlines.

~~Planning and Managing A Construction Renovation Project~~

In any building project there are unknown factors, particularly if the project is large or complex. In a new build, many of these can be resolved before construction begins, during the scope and design stage. In a renovation or alteration, your existing building's construction may not be understood until part way through the building process.
